

I am a writer...

I am a writer. I can communicate my ideas for a purpose: to entertain, inform, explain or persuade. My writing skills enable me to transcend subject disciplines, and so I am able to write as storyteller, a poet, geographer, a scientist, a designer, an historian, a mathematician and an engineer. I have been empowered: I understand the technical disciplines of grammar, punctuation, sentence construction and text structure; I know the intent and affect these aspects of writing have on an intended audience. I can use accurate vocabulary. I create and craft ideas for audiences beyond my classroom.

	Key Concepts
What is writing? The earliest known writing dates back to around 3,000 BC and is widely believed to have been invented by the Sumerians, living in major cities with centralised economies in what is now southern Iraq. Temple officials needed to keep records of the grain, sheep and cattle entering or leaving their stores and farms and it became impossible to rely on memory. An alternative method was required and the very earliest texts were pictures of the items scribes needed to record (known as pictographs). They began to draw marks in the clay to make up signs, which were standardised, so they could be recognised by many people. A wedge-shaped instrument (usually a cut reed) was used to press the signs into soft clay. This gave the writing system its name, 'cuneiform', meaning wedge-shaped. From these beginnings, cuneiform signs were put together and developed to represent sounds, so they could be used to record spoken language. Once this was achieved, ideas and concepts could be expressed and communicated in writing. Today writing continues to serve purpose: to inform, entertain, explain and persuade.	Writing has four intended purposes: inform, entertain, explain or persuade.
	Writing is presented in a range of formality.
	There are rules and disciplines to writing: These are the spelling of words; the grammatical accuracy of words and these words within sentences and the punctuation devices that help to clarify meaning.
	Vocabulary informs the accuracy of the intended written word. Words can be printed or presented in handwritten form

The Writing Process (The 7 Stages of the Writing Process | Bradford Research School)

According to the EEF's Improving Literacy in Key Stage 2 guidance report, writing can be broken down into seven stages: Planning, Drafting, Sharing, Evaluating, Revising, Editing and Publishing.

Writing well is said to be a 'process that requires that the writer think carefully about the purpose for writing, plan what to say, plan how to say it, and understand what the reader needs to know.' (IES's practice guide 'Teaching Elementary School Students to be Effective Writers')

Audience and Purpose

When planning a unit of writing, a purpose for the writing should be identified.

Teachers should be asking themselves:

- What will children write?
- What is the intended purpose of writing?
- Who is the intended audience for their writing?

Identifying a motivating audience and purpose is the key to good writing – knowing what the publishing stage is going to look like will inform all the other elements of the writing process.

The most effective way to teach writing is to model it (see Alex Quigley's 'Modelling Writing Approaches'). Going through the writing process themselves to create the final piece of writing also serves as a WAGOLL which pupils can refer to generates insight into the potential difficulties that children might have when writing.

Teachers shouldn't expect good writing if they have not modelled it themselves.

All stages of the writing process should be live-modelled, preferably using the I do/we do/you do approach.

Teachers need to be mindful of the following points:

- Whether pupils have been shown how to plan
- Whether the planning process has been modelled by deconstructing an existing text
- Whether pupils know who they can share with and get feedback from
- Whether pupils have been shown how to edit using some anonymised work or a deliberately written bad example
- Whether they (the teacher) have created an examples of the final published piece to share

The EEF guidance advocates a gradual release of support/scaffolding which can be applied to each stage of the writing process:

- An explicit description of the strategy and when and how it should be used;
- Modelling of the strategy in action by teachers and/or pupils
- Collaborative use of the strategy in action
- Guided practice using the strategy with gradual release of responsibility; and
- Independent use of the strategy

The evaluating stage

Without knowledge of who the audience are and what the purpose of the writing is, pupils (and teachers) will have very little to evaluate the writing against. It will be possible to evaluate it in terms of spelling, grammar, punctuation and handwriting, but not in terms of its composition, structure and overall effectiveness as a piece of writing.

In order to make the evaluating stage easier for children they need to have developed a set of goals in the planning stage. These goals should guide them at each stage, but care should be taken that these goals don't become a box ticking, writing by numbers activity.

The evaluating stage is the gateway to the sharing stage when peers and adults will also use the same set of goals to evaluate the work they are having shared with them.

When modelling the evaluating stage, teachers are giving pupils writing-specific strategies for self-regulation and metacognition. Pupils should be shown how to read their work, and the work of others, critically, asking themselves questions such as: Is there enough detail? Do I say too much? Is it clear or confusing? Did I miss bits out?

The revising stage

Revising is different to editing. The EEF summarise revising as 'making changes to the content of writing in light of feedback and self-evaluation' whereas editing is 'making changes to ensure the text is accurate and coherent.' The report clarifies editing by saying that 'at this stage, spelling and grammar assume greater importance and pupils will need to recognise that their work will need to be accurate if readers are to engage with it and extract the intended information from it.'

Revisions should be made to work to ensure that it is achieving the goals set at the beginning of the writing sequence – the audience and purpose should be taken into consideration. In order to revise work successfully, pupils will also need to have received feedback from the teacher on their planning and their first draft.

Pupils should be asking themselves the kind of questions they asked of themselves in the Evaluating Stage but this time they should be acting upon their evaluations by making changes and additions to their work.

Explicitly modelling how pupils might go about making changes and additions to their work needs to be modelled by the teacher.

Flexible use of the stages of the writing process

When writers are fluent in the seven stages of the writing process, they will find that they flit back and forth between the different stages. This too can and should be modelled and signposted to pupils as teachers require them to complete different tasks during the teaching sequence that leads up to the final piece of writing.

*'The writing process is the means through which a writer composes text. Writing is not a linear process, writers should learn to move easily back and forth between components of the writing process, often altering their plans and revising their text along the way.' (p14, Teaching Elementary School Students to be Effective Writers)

Closing the Writing Gap

MODELLING WRITING APPROACHES

	MODELLING APPROACH	POTENTIAL BENEFITS	POTENTIAL LIMITATIONS
100% teacher modelling ➤	Live modelling, undertaken wholly by the teacher, with no direct pupil input. It typically includes a teacher 'think aloud', where they verbalise their thinking behind their writing moves as they enact them.	This approach allows for pupils to devote all their mental effort to engaging with the ideas during composition, along with the moves being made by teachers at each step of the writing process.	The observation of the teacher demands concentration and potential passivity from pupils may see them not fully engage with the writing process. Pupils may not be able to make the jump to enacting the moves independently.
Whole class shared modelling ➤	Teacher led modelling of writing to the group, but interactive, with pupils contributing ideas, making suggested edits etc.	This approach allows for pupils to be led by an expert, and so their ideas can be scaffolded, with discussion and shared insights aiding novice pupils who may struggle to produce complex writing independently.	The approach can be highly demanding and induce split attention, between following the teachers moves, contributing ideas, and listening to peers.
Small group shared modelling ➤	An interactive approach led by the teacher, but with a smaller group to allow for more detailed interactions and support of individuals.	This approach offers the teacher opportunity to provide more individualised support for struggling writers. It offers a well-structured scaffold, whilst still ensuring pupils generate their own ideas.	This approach, by its nature, only reaches a small group, so it may have tricky implications for classroom management and the monitoring of the whole group, or require additional teaching time.
Partial modelling ➤	An interactive approach led by a teacher, who initiates a writing model, but then hands over responsibility for pupils to continue the writing task.	This approach offers the benefit of pupils being able to devote attention to the teacher's expert writing moves, but then goes on to undertake scaffolded practice of their own writing moves.	This approach may encourage a reliance on teacher planning and initiating writing, and so potentially stunt independent writing. Pupils could struggle to sustain the model.
Modelling of examples and non-examples ➤	The teacher models effective writing by sharing expert examples and flawed exemplars by way of comparison.	Pupils can benefit from the contrast of examples and non-examples, as they are exposed to excellent models, but can also critique flawed examples that expose common errors or misconceptions.	The selection, identification, or production of multiple examples can require intensive planning. Additionally, pupils may not be able to distinguish the errors in the non-examples, so new misconceptions may be formed.
Peer modelling ➤	Pupils write collaboratively, mostly independent of the teacher.	This collaborative approach can encourage writing independence, whilst still having the supportive input of a peer/s. It can develop independent writing.	Even in collaboration, pupils may lack the knowledge to write effectively in collaboration. Also, effective peer working can be demanding and require significant scaffolding and skilled classroom management.
